Butterflies go through a The Caterpillar Transformation cycle that involves several stages: egg, larva/pupa and adult. Within the chrysalis, an inching, cylindrical eating machine remakes itself into a beautiful flying creature that drinks through a straw. This requires that the old caterpillar body be broken down and turned into something new.

And these little critters have one serious appetite—they actually eat their own. Considering my own recent struggles to create an online career as an author and speaker, I've been wondering what I can learn from my failures and if I can figure out how to "fail better" in the future so that I can experience less disappointment and despair in the aftermath.
